

FLORENCE AND HER FRIENDS

by
Hal Ames

There once was a young girl named Florence who was a very happy child. She had many friends. She played and played and played. All of the children in the neighborhood liked her. They all wanted to go to her house to play. She had many toys and things to play with. The problem was the children made such a mess in her bedroom every day that it began to bother her, and soon she got upset.

“Why do I always have to clean my room? The other children always make such a mess. I need to find a way to solve this problem,” she said to herself.

She thought, and she thought, until finally she came up with an idea. If the kids were going to play in her room, she would charge them a penny. With the money she collected from the kids, she would pay one of them to clean her room for her. This was a wonderful plan.

The next day when all of the children came to play, she met them at the door.

She said to them, “You’ll need to pay me one penny before you can come in.”

The children looked at each other. “One penny?” they said. “We have to pay one penny to play with your toys? When did this happen?”

“I have decided since you always come to my room and mess it up, I would charge a penny for you to play in my room,” she replied to them. “I always have to clean my room after you leave.”

“But we don’t have a penny to give you,” the children responded.

“Then I guess you cannot come in to play,” Florence said. Then she turned to go inside her house, closing the door behind her.

All afternoon Florence played in her room. It stayed so neat and clean. The only clutter in her room was the mess she made herself. She could clean it up so easily. She played and played by herself.

The next day the children came again to her house. They asked if they could play with her toys.

Once again Florence told them, “It’ll cost you one penny to come and play in my room. It is always so messy. Then I have to clean up the mess. So, if you have a penny you can come and play.”

The children turned and went back to their homes.

Florence went back to her room. She was proud that her room was so clean. After playing in her room, she could go to sleep. She did not have to clean up the mess.

She thought to herself, “At least it’s my own clutter I’m cleaning, not the mess of those other children.”

The next morning Florence went to her door to talk to the children. No one was there. They had not come to her house to play. Florence thought that maybe there was a holiday, or a party somewhere else. Maybe the children had gone there to play.

She went to her room. She took out all of her toys. They ended up everywhere. She was bored with her toys. They were not as much fun as before. When it came time for her to go to bed, her room was such a mess. It took her longer than ever to clean it. She did not really want to clean her room, but her mother said she had to.

The next day no one came to her house. She went to her room and sat in the middle of her floor. She just sat. She was so bored.

She went to her mother. She told her what had happened. She told her how she was tired of cleaning her room all of the time. None of her friends would help her. So, she decided to charge a penny for them to play in her room. That way she could pay one of them to help her to clean her room. She told her how none of the children had a penny.

So, for the past several days she had played by herself, and now she was bored.

Her mother told her that if she wanted friends she would have to share. Her mother suggested that she should ask her friends to help her clean her room before they left. She told her not to charge her friends a penny to play with her toys.

Florence thought about her mother's idea. She agreed she would try it. She wondered what her friends would say. Maybe they were mad at her.

Florence went to talk to her friends. She went to each of her friends' homes and she told them they would not have to pay a penny to play in her room anymore. She asked them to help her clean her room before they left. Her friends agreed.

The next day all of her friends came to her house. They ran to her room and made a very big mess. Florence smiled. She liked having her friends back.
