

SEARCH & RESCUE

by
Hal Ames

It had rained for five days. We lived in the desert, so having this much rain was very unusual for us. The rain had flooded the creek and covered the road with water. The radio was the only communication we had. The water was rising around us so we were becoming worried about our house.

Our ranch was located about twenty-five miles from the nearest town. We raised horses and cattle. The ranch has been in our family for five generations. We had never seen so much rain before.

On the first day, we watched the rain as it started. We laughed at the water as it flowed off the roof of our house. The little streams of water that ran from our house down to the creek provided a fun place to play. We took sticks and put them in the water. Then we watched the sticks as they floated down the hill and then fell into the creek. We found many things to play with in the water.

On the second day, the rain became harder. Our parents made us stay in the house. We were bored because all we could do was look out the window at the rain as it made the ground muddy and soft.

We watched TV and heard about the storm. The weatherman said the rain was not going to stop. We heard about how it was causing problems in many other places in our state.

We played games with each other as the rain made noise on the roof above us. Mother tried to keep calm, but we could tell she was worried.

On the third day, the water in the creek began to rise above its banks. The water was moving very fast. Usually there was very little water in the creek bed, but now it was completely full. Mother told us to stay away from the creek. She said if we fell into the creek, we would be washed away, never to be seen again.

We looked out of the window on the morning of the fourth day. We looked in amazement at how much water there was. The bridge was either under water or it was gone. The water covered our road to the highway. The corral where we kept the horses was so muddy the horse's legs were almost stuck.

Father went out to feed the horses, and when he came back into the house, he was dripping wet. He told us that the horses were OK, but the mud was getting deeper. He put them inside the barn so they would be out of the rain.

The cattle were out in the pasture, and they were standing on high ground. The water was flowing past our house so fast we could see trees and bushes being washed away. Father was beginning to get worried for our family. What if the floodwater came into our house? He tried to make us feel safe, but we could tell he was worried.

It was now the fifth day. The rain was coming down as hard as ever. The water from the creek was now coming closer to our house. Father released the horses into the pasture so they could join the cattle in the hills. Our car was now under water, as was our tractor. All around our house the water was rising.

All night long mother and father, along with my older brother, tried to put bags of sand around the house to stop the water from entering our home, but when the water went over the wall they realized that it was not going to work. They stopped and came inside.

The three of them sat at the table deciding what to do next. After a few minutes, they came to the living room to make an announcement.

“We're going to have to leave the house. The car is under water, and we won't be able to walk,” Father told us. “We’re going to have to call for help.”

Father called Search and Rescue to find out the best way to get out of the house.

“Hello, this is Search and Rescue, what can I do for you?” the voice answered the phone.

“This is Jorge Ortigas, we live out in Verde Valley. Our house is almost flooded. We need help,” father told the lady on the other end of the line.

“Hold on just a moment please,” the woman said.

After a few seconds, another person got on the phone. “This is Sergeant Rodriguez, is this Jorge?” The new voice said.

“Hi Berto. We are almost under water here, and we need your help. The road is flooded, and our creek is almost up to the house. Can you help us?” father begged.

“I’ll get a helicopter out to you as soon as possible. It may be a few hours. We’ve got many requests for help,” Sergeant Rodriguez responded.

“OK, we’ll be ready when you get here, but please hurry. The water is rising fast,” father answered.

Father hung up the phone, and then he said to us, “OK kids, we’ll need to go upstairs. You can pack one small bag. When you’re finished, meet us in our room.”

We did as we were told, and after we were ready, we met mother and father in their room.

“The phone doesn’t work anymore, so we’ll have to listen to the radio,” father told us as he turned on some music on our portable radio to calm us down.

An hour later, we heard the sound of the helicopter. We had to climb onto the roof of our house. The first floor of our house was filling with water, and it was coming up the stairs to where we were.

“Dad, look at the water!” my sister screamed.

“Hurry, go out of the window and onto the roof,” dad ordered as he helped each one of us out of the window onto the roof.

The wind was blowing from the helicopter. The rain was still falling making us completely wet.

The helicopter lowered a basket for us to get into. A man came down with a rope and helped my little sister into the basket. We were pulled up to the helicopter one at a time. That part was fun.

Father was the last one to get into the basket, and just as he did, the house began to buckle and then broke away. We watched it as it floated down the creek.

We cuddled with each other and cried. Our house was gone, but we were thankful that we were all safe.
