

THE VIOLIN

When I was a boy, I met a most interesting man. He lived a simple life, and he lived alone.

His name was Park, Young Woo. He was a kind old man who loved to talk about many things. He would talk to people about almost anything and he would make it very fun. People would just sit and listen to his stories.

The war had just ended when I met him. The army from the north had attacked our country and many people were hungry and tired. Yet Park, Young Woo was always happy and he helped to cheer up the people around him.

He lived in a house built of small pieces of wood, cardboard, and metal he had found along the road. Most of his house was made of cardboard. He cut small windows in the walls of his box in order to let in the light. On the top, he put pieces of metal to keep out the rain. It was only one room, but it was enough for him and his dog.

Most of the time he sat in front of his house with his dog lying beside him. He offered to repair shoes as people walked by. In a small wooden box, he had some thread, pieces of leather, colored polish, and glue.

If a person left their shoes with him in the morning, they were repaired and ready in the evening. People always said he did a wonderful a job.

Day after day, he sat in front of his box repairing shoes. While he worked, he would tell stories to anyone who would listen.

He worked on his right knee while sitting on a small stool. His dog lay beside him. He was very good at what he did. People came to the shoemaker from our little village to have their shoes fixed, but most of all, people loved to hear him tell stories of when he was a young boy living on the farm with his family.

While he worked, he would hum songs or whistle. He enjoyed his work very much. When someone would walk by, he would begin a conversation. Most people would stop and chat with him for a short time, but sometimes they would sit and talk with him for hours. He was a wise old man, and there was nothing he would not talk about.

On my way to school, I liked to stop and talk to him. He was always very busy repairing a pair of shoes, but he still talked to me.

One day, I heard a new sound coming from the cardboard box. It was beautiful music. At first, I thought it was a radio playing the music, but when I got close to his box, I realized that he was playing a violin. He was playing it so gently and sweetly that the entire place filled with joy.

Other people began to come to listen to the music from the old shoemaker.

He played and played. He played familiar songs as well as songs I had never heard before. The people who had were there to listen, were silent.

When he finished, the people clapped and asked for more. He bowed at the waist and played again. It was dark when he finally said good-bye and disappeared into his small cardboard box.

Everyone in the town began to talk about the music from the old man. No one remembered ever hearing music played like that before.

The next day I asked him where he had gotten the violin he was playing. He told me that he had traded it. He repaired an old pair of shoes for a lady in the city and then she gave him the violin.

He said it was not a very good violin, but it was nice to play again.

I asked him where he learned to play so well.

He told me he had played all of his life, but, when the war came, his violin had been destroyed. He did not have enough money to buy another one. Now he would be able to make music anytime he wanted. He had a big smile on his face.

Many of the people decided to collect money to buy him a new violin. Everyone became excited about the idea. I was happy to give some money to help buy him the new violin.

Every day, after he finished his work, the old man played his violin and filled the street with soft gentle music. More and more people came to hear him play.

When there was enough money collected, the leader of our village went to the city and purchased a brand new violin.

They were going to ask the old shoemaker to come to the park, play for the town, and then they would surprise him by giving him his new violin.

On the day he was to receive the violin, a young boy was sent to ask the old man to come to the park to play for everyone. Usually, the old man only stayed at his cardboard box. He did not like to go to other places very often.

It a long time has passed when the young boy came back alone. He told us something was wrong. The old man would not wake up.

The leaders of the town went quickly to his cardboard box to see why the old man had not come to the park.

When they returned, they told us the old man had died, probably the in his sleep night before. Everyone began to cry.

The leaders of our village made the place where the old man had lived into a special memorial. They left everything the way he had lived. His wooden box, his violin, his bed, and everything else he had, was left the way they were when he died.
